Q: Reasons for unusually low unit test coverage in a large enterprise project I have been working on a large project that has a large percentage of the classes in the project having zero unit tests. When I look at the code coverage, the coverage is very low even though my unit test ratio is roughly 80% - 100%. A few classes have good coverage, but most of them have no tests at all. If I were to implement some of the classes that have low coverage, would it be worth the effort? Would the code be sufficiently covered without implementing it? A: This is normal, especially in large enterprise code. People tend to rush into big projects without properly planning, so by the time you're in the middle of one, you'll have plenty of code that's unmaintained and needs testing. It's not a problem with the code itself, but rather with your approach to testing. A few of the good ones have unit tests. If a class is small and you don't expect it to change much, then it's probably worth refactoring it into a class. They're usually most useful for smaller unit tests, but they can also be handy for writing larger tests. The reason you're not getting code coverage is that your tests aren't sufficiently covering the code. The deeper the class, the less likely it is to get covered. A: Unit tests usually have the aim of testing each method, or an operation, or a set of classes as a whole. For a large project, you are likely to have a lot of methods, classes, and probably a lot of features, and as such you might not have a test for each. In this case you have no choice but to write tests that can cover a few of the features and as such you are unlikely to get very good coverage on the project as a whole. A: Unit tests are typically used to test individual methods, and many of them can be quite big, even for an enterprise project. I'd suggest writing a new test that exercises the method fully, by calling the method from the outside with all the relevant parameters. It's also possible that the test is failing for a good reason, such as the method parameter does not match the method signature. If you have some good unit tests, then they are usually limited to a single
